Interview Questions

1. Tell us who you are and why you write Human Subjects Research: An Insider's View. What made you to write this book?
2. What was your experience during the AIDs epidemic? What would you like the IRB world to know?
3. It was inspiring to read that research improved your health and probably saved your life and that you very much believe in the research process. Tell us specifically, how a Clinical trial saved your life.
4. How has your experience as a research participant informed your approach to evaluate or write informed consent forms?
5. Name one to three things that you could tell people who have not been a research participant that will help empower them to do a better job in the IRB.

Interview Questions Continues...

6. In the past, how has compensation impacted your decision to participate in research?
7. In the book you described a doctor who insisted on performing extra biopsies on participants when they were not needed. Of course, this happened many many years ago... What types of things can IRB professionals do today, to prevent added risk to participants?
8. In your book, you talk about how an Expanded Access program saved your life and this led to you becoming a community advocate and activist. Tell us what motivated you to help others to develop research priorities in these roles?
9. What was your experience transitioning from a regulatory coordinator for a clinic to the IRB?
10. How did this inform you and make you a better IRB professional?

Final Interview Questions

11. Tell us more about what you are doing these days.

12. What is the most important thing to say to empower IRB professionals?

13. Is there anything we should have asked you that we did not think about?
